INTRODUCTION

"How Canadians live domestically, whether in a family or in another kind of household, has been evolving for decades. But the period since the early 1970s has been remarkable for the pace and scope of changes in family lifestyles.

More Canadians than ever before are living outside traditional two-parent families. There have been substantial increases in the population living alone and in families headed by lone parents, and women make up the majority of both groups. At the same time, the traditional family itself has changed, Canadians are marrying later and divorcing and remarrying in large numbers. Couples are having fewer children. Many more wives, including those with young children, are working outside the home.

The evolution of domestic living arrangements has particular significance for women. The quality of women's lives and their social and economic opportunities outside the family are affected to a far greater degree by their type of family and living arrangement than are those of men.

Women, for example, are far more likely than men to terminate or reduce paid employment outside the home when they marry and especially when there are children. As well, the family is a greater source of financial security for most women than for their spouses, such that when family units dissolve, either through divorce or death of a spouse, women are far more vulnerable to economic hardship."

"Perhaps the single most dramatic development in the situation of women since 1970 has been their influx into the labour force. The number of women engaging in some form of paid work almost doubled between 1970 and 1983, and by the early 1980s, more than half of women aged 15 and over held jobs outside their homes. As well, this growth of the female labour force continued even through the period of difficult economic times in the early part of the 1980s. But while many more women have jobs, the circumstances of their working lives have not changed as radically. Working women remain concentrated in relatively low-paying service and clerical occupations, many of which are part-time. And while women's earnings relative to those of men increased, the wage gap is still wide."
